Breast cancer surgery is definitely a team sport. Every week, our group has a multidisciplinary breast cancer conference that's attended by breast surgical oncology, breast medical oncology, breast radiation oncology, pathology, radiology, plastic surgery, and genetics. We present every new breast cancer and talk about them in a multidisciplinary fashion.

Like we showed in the last surgery, it required some pretty complex localization. And I wouldn't be able to have that perfect localization preoperatively without my excellent breast imagers.

After surgery, we offer all of the most advanced clinical trials and endocrine therapy that requires breast medical oncologists who are fellowship and specialty trained in this area. Also, our plastic surgeons are my constant partners in these cases. About half of our cases we do in combination with plastic surgery. I feel so lucky to have amazing reconstructive plastics colleagues.
