

With DHIVY a patient can use their fingers. They'll have to use a razor blade and chop up a pill into powder. You can take the medication and break it with your fingers and get just the amount of levodopa you need, whether it's a half pill or a quarter pill, all the way up to a full bar worth of DHIVY if you need to.

So what I instruct patients is that, especially the ones that need very tight control. If they feel like they're turning off in a situation, they can maybe take a little half pill or a two bars worth of DHIVY or two fractions of DHIVY to half of it, and get more on time with that preparation.

So I think patients will have different needs depending on what they're doing at different times during the day. The folks that are very active and feel like they're wearing off in a situation where they're fishing or they're actively doing something helping build a barn a friend's house, those things. They're going to need maybe a little extra levodopa.

Maybe half of a DHIVY to stay on if they're starting to wear off before their next dose kicks in. But folks that are at home and just feel a little wearing off coming on, maybe they need one quarter of a DHIVY tablet to turn on and work well.
